The mere fact that we have not raised the rates does not by any means prove conclusively that we do not consider the hazard increased; for instance, the brakeman on the little branch run where there is but one crew, with no possible cluster for a collision, pays the same rate for his insurance as his brother brakeman on the insurance as his brother brakeman on the main line local, who probably makes first couplings, and is as many times exposed to the former's one. No one will argue to the former's one. No one will argue that in the local man's case the hazari is not increased, still his rate is not increased, because both are classed as Mr. Wortham, LL.
